CHAPTER II.—(Continued.)

The young man came to his guardian with one of these letters one afternoon just as he was taking up his hat to go out.

"Just sign it yourself, Hugh," he said, "and I am in a hurry."

Hugh hesitated a little. "Wouldn't it be better—?" he began.

"No, no, mine of course. The letter is really of very little importance, but the man will expect to see my signature, I suppose."

Without another moment's hesitation the young man sat down and signed the letter, as he had been requested to do.

He settled down again then to his ordinary work, which he was conducting as usual in his employer's private office.

When Hugh first met his guardian the next day, he was conscious of a little anxiety, as if the mood which he should find him, the slight disagreement with regard to the signing of the letter—

Three months passed, and the business connection between the old and younger man had gone on smoothly.

"I'm off to London again, Hugh, for a few days, and shall leave things in your charge; I know it will be all right," he said.

Hugh answered that he would do his best to deserve his confidence; but he had a little anxiety, as if the mood which he should find him, the slight disagreement with regard to the signing of the letter—

"What! not if I were standing by and saw you sign it? Why, my dear boy, it's practically the same thing as if I had signed it for you, sir."

"Yes, of course, I know that, and if you want me to do it I will," said Hugh, but he did not look comfortable over it.

"No, I don't want you to do it," said Beale, with a laugh; "but I tell you what would be a good job. Suppose you make out a seven days' promissory note in your own favor, sign it with my name, and see if you can discount it."

"I don't suppose I should," Hugh said, with a smile. "I can copy that flourish of yours at the end, sir, to a nicety."

"I know you can. Well, sit down, and let's see how you fill it up. Make it out for $20; and look here, we'll have a little more on it. I'll lay you $5 you get the money."

"No, thanks," said Hugh, laughing and coloring; "my finances just now are not in a state to admit of getting, and of course if I do get the money I'll hand it over to you directly you come back."

"Of course, I don't propose to make you a present of it, my boy. But how comes it," he added, laying his hand on his shoulder, "that you are hard up—no bad habits, I hope, Hugh?"

astonished to speak, "it is the one you told me to sign myself. Surely you remember? It was done merely in joke. I was just trying to coax a confession from Mr. Beale about his head-gravity."

"Is it likely," he said, "that a business man would lend himself to such a joke as that—it is for your own sake, Hugh. Hugh hated at him in an agony of consternation and dismay."

"Beale," he said again, "is it possible that you don't remember suggesting this to me the very morning you went away as a good joke, as a test of how far my imitation of your signature could deceive people? Have you forgotten that you offered to let me $5 upon the spot, and I refused; that you have many times requested me to sign your letters, saying that the facility would come in useful some day?"

"But the note—the letter!" cried Hugh, in an agony. "I try and remember that, but the most I can do is to say that I am speaking the truth. I am sure if you try you will be able to recollect."

But a horrible thought was growing in Hugh's mind. He had been under the influence of drink at the time, and not only unaccountable for what he said, but had absolutely, hopelessly forgotten the whole of the incident.

"I have every wish to believe you," said Beale; "you don't suppose it is a pleasure to me to find my old friend's son guilty of such conduct; but the tale you tell is so improbable, and it deserves to be taboed by all sensible business men if I permitted such a thing. Is it likely, either, that I should be away from home for so long a time, and that I should be able to return in the manner you describe. No, I must have some proof."

Hugh, who had been standing, white-faced and miserable, leaning against the table, which he required for actual physical support under this terrible accusation, started forward eagerly.

"I don't know how glad I am to see you, sir," he said, with a smile; "but I break in his voice that all his self-control could not prevent, 'that I should not have been so long away from you, but I won't tempt you in any way; I will go myself. Tell me where I shall find the envelope you speak of.'

That's Advice of Chief Bear, of Tohobe Tribe, and He's Proved His Theory. Chief Bear, who was chief of the old Tohobe tribe, had lived in the region which has reached the great age of 106 years.

Chief Bear was born in Andover, N. B., in April, 1798, and lived alternately in his native Andover and in the hunting country. He has killed in his time over 1000 moose and as many deer.

When there was a rumor that Bald Mountain was to be taken, Chief Bear, who had been at the time of the earthquake, swallowed up a large quantity of food.

Chief Bear was a man of great strength and endurance. He was a hunter and a warrior, and his life was a story of adventures.

Hugh settled down contentedly to his work, but he did not look comfortable over it. He was a young man of great energy and ambition, and he was determined to succeed.

"I have had," said Mr. Beale, "a long and interesting conversation with you, and I am glad to hear that you are so well. I am sure you will do well in your new position."

Hugh turned first red and then white; he felt his heart give a sudden unexpected thump in his breast. "What a horrible thing could his guardian be going to say? For the life of his head he could not find a word to answer."

Mr. Beale kept silence for a moment; he was busily scripping with his penknife at something in his pocket, as if that proceeding absorbed his whole attention. He spoke at last, in a quiet, jerky tone.

"Foster," he said, "has presented to me for payment a promissory note made out in your favor. Now, Hugh, I am quite certain I have never put my signature to any such thing. What is it?"

OIL BRINGS HIM RICHES.

How a Kansas Passenger Conductor Has Become a Millionaire.

Among those who have hit it rich in oil in the Kansas field is S. H. Hale of Neodesha, Kan. For twelve years he has been a passenger conductor on the Frisco road, running out of Joplin. He always had a speculative turn of mind.

One day a friend of his in Joplin who had some mineral property got hard up. He sold his claim to Hale for $3000.
