SEED POTATO PLOT DEMONSTRATION

A worthwhile Southeastern Wisconsin Potato Field day will be held Tuesday, July 28th, on the Reinhold Krossin farm 2 1/2 miles northeast of Rockfield, according to an announcement by County Agent E. E. Skallskey who will be in charge of the meeting. It is hoped to make this field day one of the largest potato demonstrations to be held in the state. The main program, which will feature a number of well known authorities on the potato industry as speakers, will get under way at 2 p. m., although the affair will be of all day duration. Professor Milward and assistants will be at the farm as early as 9 a. m. to hold individual conferences with potato growers.

This field day is being held under the direction of the Department of Horticulture, College of Agriculture, with the Wisconsin Potato Growers association co-operating. About a two acre field has been planted to trial plots representing seed stocks obtained from growers in Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the Dakotas. All plots received equal care and treatment. Many interesting facts concerning the growth and the disease resisting qualities of the plots are already in evidence. From the growth made and the general condition of the plants valuable conclusions as to variety relation to diseases, variety adaptations, and general potato problems to southeastern Wisconsin growers may be drawn. To study these habits is the main purpose of this field demonstration.

A program of special interest to Wisconsin potato growers will be presented. It is as follows:

1. Introductory remarks: County Agent E. E. Skallskey.
2. Certification and seed potato distribution problems and variety adaptations: J. G. Milward and J. W. Brann, staff members of the Department of Horticulture.
3. Potato diseases and their control: by a staff member of the Department of Plant Pathology.
4. Potato grades and standardization problems by a member of the Carlot Inspection Service: Elmer Petersen, Department of Agriculture and Markets.
5. Factors affecting quality in potatoes: W. E. Tottinham, Department of Agricultural Chemistry.
6. County agents from the southeastern section of the state will participate in the discussion which will follow the general program. Growers who furnished the seed stock for the plots will also participate in the discussion.

Many of the leading potato growers of the state are expected to attend the demonstration meeting. Among those who have indicated their intention to attend are growers from Kenosha, Racine, Milwaukee, Walworth, Ozaukee, Waukesha, and Dodge counties. Northern Wisconsin potato growers will also be represented.

An exhibit featuring potato disease specimens, control measures, and seed and variety problems will be installed in one of the farm buildings. All farmers and others interested are urged to attend this field day.

County agents from the southeastern section of the state will participate in the discussion which will follow the general program. Growers who furnished the seed stock for the plots will also participate in the discussion.

LOCAL STARS ARRANGE GAME FOR SATURDAY AFTERNOON

A baseball game, which is to be played on the local diamond, has been arranged for Saturday afternoon, July 25, when a team composed entirely of young players from this village, will meet the Blue Eagle A. C. team of Milwaukee. This is the same team which played here last year. The game will start at 2 p. m. and all are invited to attend. BIG GAME HERE SUNDAY

Next Sunday afternoon there'll be a hot game on the local diamond when the strong Grafton nine, which tied for first place in the first half, and which is tied with Kewaskum for first place in this half, will furnish the opposition. This should prove a tough contest for the locals but the boys have again hit their stride and have a fine chance to win, so let's all support the team at this big game Sunday and help them win it, as well as hold first place.

Attend the baseball game Sunday, when the strong Grafton team plays here.

AUGUST C. BACKUS SERIOUSLY INJURED

August C. Backus, a former resident of this village, who was born and raised here, and formerly judge of the municipal court at Milwaukee, was seriously injured last week Thursday evening when he fell from a moving North Western train near the Milwaukee North Western Road station.

The train, coming from St. Paul, was bound for Chicago. The accident occurred while the train had slowed down for the usual running inspection. Mr. Backus was seen to fall from the train by three witnesses who ran to his aid and called an ambulance to remove him to the County Emergency hospital where surgeons stitched up an eight inch gash in his scalp. An operation and blood transfusion also became necessary at the hospital. Later reports are that the former judge is getting along nicely and is in no immediate danger from his harrowing experience.

Mr. Backus is a member of the board of regents of the University of Wisconsin and was president and publisher of the Milwaukee Sentinel from 1924 to 1929. He is also a member of the law firm of Corrigan, Backus, Sullivan and Backus of Milwaukee.

AIR-CONDITIONED EQUIPMENT PLACED IN WEST BEND THEATRE

A force of men were busy the past week at the West Bend theatre at West Bend, installing new air conditioning equipment in the theatre which will absorb the humidity in the building and keep the theatre comfortably cool in the very hottest of weather.

The new air-conditioning system, which has had a thorough tryout the past week, has definitely proven its value in bringing perfect comfort to the patrons of this show house in the extreme heat.

The weather is always just right in the West Bend theatre. The air-conditioning system does more than merely cool and circulate the air—it removes excess humidity, withdraws dust, pollen and other harmful particles—protecting your health and increasing your comfort. You will find miles of fresh, crisp, cool air in this theatre—No perspiration, no discomfort.

Mr. Aug. Berkholtz, owner of the theatre, is always on the lookout for improvements for the entertainment and convenience of his vast theatre-going audiences, and he extends a cordial invitation to all to come and inspect this new addition. He will always be happy to show you around.

"COLLEGE INN REVUE" WELL RECEIVED

"The College Inn Revue of 1936" sponsored by the businessmen of Kewaskum, held at the high school auditorium last Thursday evening was very well received by the small audience who greeted the local talent who took part in the audition put on by the College Inn of the Hotel Sherman of Chicago.

The winners of the audition here were the Misses Linda Rosenheimer and Charlotte Romaine, who will represent Kewaskum at a similar contest to be held in the near future at Manitowish. The winner at that place will be given a chance to exhibit their talent in the floor show at the College Inn at Chicago, with all expenses paid.

Those taking part in the local revue received many compliments from the audience in the form of applause from time to time in the course of the entertainment.

The local baseball team wore deep paths around the bases here last Sunday afternoon when they started out the second half of the split season by soundly thrashing the Port Washington nine 20 to 2—enough runs for three touchdowns and two points after three outs. Other winners were Grafton and Mayville, to get the jump in the second half race over the other teams.

Coupled with seven Port errors, Kewaskum banged out a total of 20 hits off the deliveries of Ryer and Dude, Milwaukee Brewer rookie, to run up the lopsided score, although the 20 runs might have been cut in half if Port's pitchers had had any support. Included in the locals' array of hits were six extra base smashes.

Wozniak starred at the plate with four hits, one a home run with the bases full, out of five trips to the plate. Mathias, Mucha and Jagmin collected three apiece. The latter also featured on the mound, allowing eight hits, striking out seven, issuing no walks, and holding the visitors in check at all times. "Slap" Rock, Port catcher, was informally "kicked out" of the game in the fifth inning for too violently disagreeing with Umpire Kohler's decisions.

Kewaskum started its scoring spree in the first inning when Conley led off with a walk and crossed the rubber ahead of Mathias, who banged the ball into the school windows for a home run.

In its half of the second inning Port scored half of its two runs on a single by Decker and a double by Larson. In the last half of the same inning came Kewaskum's scoring rampage, in which the boys added seven runs to the two previous ones to bring the total to nine. Wozniak singled and scored a second later on Harbeck's triple, Jagmin singled Harbeck in, Conley was safe on a fielder's choice, and both runners advanced on Yankunas' error. Then Mathias singled both runners in, Mucha doubled, Henslak singled scoring Mathias and Mucha, Krai walked, Wozniak got his second single of the inning, scoring Henslak.

Kewaskum made it 11 in the fourth by adding two runs when Mucha was safe on Yankunas' error, Henslak was hit by a pitched ball, Wozniak singled filling the bases and Harbeck singled scoring Mucha and Henslak.

In the fifth the locals put on another rally and tallied five more runs to run their score to 16 on singles by Mathias and Mucha, Henslak again being hit by a pitched ball, Krai's safety on an error scoring Mathias, and Wozniak's fourth straight hit, a home run into the bushes in left field with the bases full.

Kewaskum's total was 19 runs after the sixth frame when Jagmin and Conley singled and Miller hit to the third baseman who caught Jagmin in a trap between third and home but wild throws by Decker and Sauer let all three runners cross the rubber.

Port scored its other run in the eighth on Dude's single, Yankunas' safety on an error, a fielder's choice to Bichler, a single by Sauer and a sacrifice fly by Quader.

In the last half of the same inning the locals tallied their 20th and last run on doubles by Marx and Mucha.

BOY CLAIMS HE WAS DOPED BY BANDITS

Fond du Lac county sheriff's officers are continuing an investigation to learn the identity of "dope" bandits who are reported to have administered a sleeping potion to Clarence Jaeger, 17, at the home of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Peter Jaeger, Highway 67, between Campbellsport and Ashford.

The youth has been questioned by sheriff's deputies without much success. He was unable to give a sufficiently accurate description of three young men who entered the Jaeger home as he lay sleeping on a couch.

According to his story, the men were standing over him when he awoke. One of them, he said, demanded money. Another one thrust a red powder under his nose, which left him in a daze for four hours.

The youth said that his parents had left to attend a funeral shortly before the men entered the house. When they returned they found the boy unconscious.

The physician who saw the youth after the father had learned of the circumstances said that he could not imagine a drug which would have the immediate effect described by the youth. There was no odor of drugs on his person, the doctor said, when he questioned him.

It was said that Peter Jaeger is the treasurer of the Catholic church at Ashford and there is a possibility that the intruders described by the youth suspected that there was money in the house. Mr. Jaeger said that the safe door was opened, but that there was no money in it and consequently nothing of value was missing.

Mr. Jaeger said his son told him that the men accosted him by saying, "Hold on there, we're after money." One of the men, the father said, brandished a revolver. The youth described one of them as having curly hair, while all three were of medium size.

WM. FROST WEDDED TO RUTH LANDMANN

A wedding of local interest was performed in the Episcopal chapel at Duluth, Minnesota, last Saturday evening at 5 p. m., when Mrs. Ruth Landmann, sister of Paul Landmann of this village, and a daughter of Dr. and Mrs. G. A. Landmann, of Scotland, South Dakota, became the bride of Mr. William Harold Frost, a son of Mr. and Mrs. Harold Frost of Wilmar, Minn., in a quiet but impressive ceremony, at which only the immediate families and a few intimate friends were in attendance.

Miss Landmann was beautifully attired for the nuptial occasion in a brown chiffon suit adorned with a corsage of gardenias, and wore a large brown chiffon hat. There were no attendants.

Following the ceremony a family dinner was served in a private dining room of the Hotel Duluth.

Mr. and Mrs. Frost will reside in the Yorkleigh apartments at Duluth, in which city Mr. Frost is employed in the Commercial Credit offices.

End of Fiscal Year Finds Government Costs Still Mounting; Balance of Budget Not Yet in Sight; Treasury Reports.

By CARLTON WILLIAMS

THE fiscal year 1936 is now ended, and the United States government's financial operations broke at least three records—records which, if Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau's reckoning holds true, will be broken again in the 1937 fiscal year which comes to a close next June 30.

During the last 12 months the government spent more money than it ever had in any peacetime fiscal year. The total was approximately 8 billion 880 million dollars.

The deficit was also the largest ever compiled by the United States government in times of peace. It was about 4 billion 754 million dollars. It would have been only about 2 billion 700 million had it not been for the passing of the veterans' bonus.

Federal expenditures, emergency and regular, advanced the public debt during the fiscal year to an all-time record high of 34 billion 427 million dollars on June 17. Between then and June 30, it was fiscal year they went back to 7 billion 200 million, if the veterans' bonus is excluded, as it fairly may be, to make sure this report is not biased politically in any way. Certainly enough, it will have to be regarded as part of the public debt.

Many expenditures which in 1933 were regarded as "emergencies" have now been included in the regular government expenditures, as may be seen in one of the charts shown here. While there has of late been a decline in emergency spending, there has been a corresponding increase in regular expenditures.

Direct relief, work relief and emergency public works expenditures have decreased from 3 billion 59 million in 1935 to 2 billion 569 million in the 1936 fiscal year. Spending for the Civilian Conservation corps is due to decline from 469 million to 308 million in the new fiscal year. Farm relief costs, measures of his program.

Revenues have never failed to improve since 1932. They were 3 billion 800 million dollars in the 1935 fiscal year, and jumped to 4 billion 116 million in the year just closed. Next year, it is estimated, they will reach 5 billion 540 million. This, if it proves true, will mean the biggest tax bill since 1920, when revenues amounted to 6 billion 695 million.

In the new fiscal year it is estimated that income taxes will provide more revenue than they have at any time since 1930, when rates were low, but incomes (1929) were at their highest. The Revenue Act of 1935 will be a factor in the rise of income taxes in the last half of the fiscal year.

Balance Six Years Off.

During the depression the major part of the tax burden has shifted from income to the excise taxes and the stamp taxes on cigarettes, liquor, gasoline, security issues and transactions, electric energy, automobiles, matches and many other items of indirect taxation. When incomes were high, they used to provide about 70 per cent of the government tax revenue, but today the "hidden" taxes, which are paid by all, regardless of income, provide more than 60 per cent of the government revenue.

These "miscellaneous internal revenue" taxes have for the past

reduced to 33 billion 779 million, largely through the redemption of soldiers' bonus bonds.

Cites Recoverable Assets.

Against this debt, Secretary Morgenthau pointed out, must be held about 34 billion, which the government holds in what he calls recoverable assets. Most of them, to be sure, are recoverable, but a certain portion of them, including about 4 billion in loans to farmers, railroads, banks, insurance companies, states and cities, are open to question; it hardly seems possible that any organization could make loans so varied in nature and combining to make so large a total, could expect to collect them all.

Other recoverable assets listed by the secretary are 2 billion 700 million cash and "money in the bank," and 2 billion in the "stabilization" fund. This latter fund, however, it would probably be unwise to touch, because it was established for specific purposes, principally for stabilizing the dollar in foreign exchange markets.

Besides what Mr. Morgenthau apparently considered legitimate subtractions from the public debt are about 4 1/2 billion in equally legitimate additions to the debt. These are government guarantees and obligations—federally underwritten corporations and the like.

It was apparent as the new fiscal year began that little or no progress in balancing the budget would be made. Although revenues are due to continue increasing, as the country enjoys a continuation of the trend back toward prosperity and as the administration's new revenue producing measures become more effective, expenditures are also due for a rise, some of them expenditures unforeseen by the government a year or two ago.

Taxes and other revenues, according to estimates, will probably surpass those of any other year in history with the exception of 1920. An important phase of the new several years established records. In the 1936 fiscal year for the first time they passed the 2 billion mark. In the new year they will probably reach 2 billion 250 million.

Even with revenues rising the way they are, they will not, at the present rate, be able to bring about a balanced budget before about six years. In order to pay for expenditures which could not come out of the regular income, and to handle the 2 billion soldiers' bonus, the treasury had to let the national debt skyrocket to 27 billion at the end of the 1934 fiscal year, 28 billion 700 million at

Incorporated somewhere in the explanation of this is the fact that the operations of many of the federal departments, especially those dealing with public works, were severely cut during the economy wave which followed the change of administration in 1933, but they are fiscal year will be the appearance for the first time in the ledger of the new social security program.

The federal ledger in the new fiscal year will be important historically because of the changing nature of its entries. It will see the institution as permanent expenditures of many of the measures which the administration adopted at first as purely "emergency" in character.

How Spending Has Increased Before 1934 the largest expenditures in peace time during a single year had been 6 billion 404 million. During the 1934 fiscal year the government found it necessary to lay out 7 billion 244 million dollars; the next year expenditures were up 132 million, but during the 1936 now finding their ways back into the budget.

For instance, when President Roosevelt first came into office he effected immediate and drastic economies in river and harbor and public building work. They were subsequently, revived in the emergency programs. Now Mr. Roosevelt has indicated his desire to return them to the permanent budget, with an annual appropriation of about 500 million dollars.

Taxes Keep Going Up. Generally, the switch of public works programs back to the regular budget, combined with other transitions, is regarded as the beginning of the attempt to make most of the New Deal a permanent phase of the government. the close of the next and now to 33 billion 750 million. Until results of pending bond transactions are known, it cannot be estimated what the debt will be at the close of the new fiscal year.

One of the interesting developments in the financial operations of the government recently has been the retirement of John Raymond McCarl, comptroller general of the United States and popularly known as the "watchdog of the treasury." He warned against wild and unjustified expenditures, and many times during his 15 years of service was a valuable check on too enthusiastic spending of public funds.

"Franks" Used on Early Pony Express, Writer Says

While letters were carried by mail, on horseback, before the issuance of postage stamps, in 1847, at Eastern points, the first record we have of a Pony Express in California was in 1848, the year gold was discovered, notes a writer in the New York Sun. Samuel Branon, publisher of the California Star, at Yerba Buena (now San Francisco) is claimed to have created the first pioneer pony express.

He proposed to carry letters for 50 cents each to Eastern points and guaranteed they would reach their destination within two weeks. On April 1, 1848, his pony started carrying mail to Independence, Mo. Instead of arriving there in the specified two weeks' time it took all summer. Then gold was discovered, and in the attendant excitement caused thereby this Pony Express became a forgotten enterprise. At the time of the gold rush Cali-ornia as a place of importance was entirely non-existent. Population and activity were centered in the north, with three rivers utilized as the main highway. San Francisco had become a city almost overnight, and the other important points were Sacramento, reached by the Sacramento River; Marysville, on the Feather River, and Stockton, on the San Joaquin. Express messengers made the rounds of the mining camps, the envelopes bearing the "frank" of the express company.

Tales and Traditions from American Political History by FRANK E. HAGEN and ELMO SCOTT WATSON

DRAFTED
FROM time to time there has been talk of "drafting" some candidate. However, there have been only two instances in our political history when a man was given the nomination against his will and in both cases the drafted candidate was defeated in the election.

In 1868 one of the issues raised by the Democrats was a demand for the payment of the war debt in paper money issued for this purpose. Its chief advocate was George H. Pendleton of Cincinnati and the appeal of the "Ohio Idea," was so great that he was the logical candidate for the nomination.

But Horatio Seymour, the Civil War governor of New York, was opposed to both the "Ohio Idea" and the candidacy of its chief supporter. As chairman of the convention he was able to prevent Pendleton's nomination but he could not keep the inflation plank out of the platform.

After many ballots and some confusion it turned to Seymour and, although he shouted from the platform "Your candidate I can not be!" the delegates went right ahead and nominated him.

Although Seymour polled 2,709,213 popular votes to 3,015,071 for Gen. U. S. Grant, the Republican nominee, and carried eight states, the electoral vote stood 214 for Grant and 80 for Seymour. This defeat ended his political career for he considered his acceptance of an unwanted nomination as the greatest mistake of his life and would never again consider running for any office.

Four years later a peculiar political situation resulted in another case of "drafting." A faction of the Republican party, dissatisfied with the Grant administration and his renomination, held another convention in Cincinnati and chose Horace Greeley for President and B. Gratz Brown of Missouri for vice-president. When the Democrats met in Baltimore they decided that a fusion ticket might defeat Grant so they also nominated Greeley and Brown.

But this action offended the "old line" Democrats so they held a convention in Louisville, Ky. For President they selected Charles O'Connor, a distinguished New York lawyer who had won the deep affection of the South by his efforts to secure the release of Jefferson Davis from prison at Fortress Monroe and to defend him against the charge of treason. O'Connor was nominated on the first ballot by a vote of 600 to four and for their vice-president they named John Quincy Adams of Massachusetts.

Immediately after the balloting O'Connor was notified by telegraph of his nomination and at once declined to accept it. The convention was thrown into disorder and an attempt was made to give the honor to the permanent chairman, James Lyons of Virginia, but he refused. So the convention adopted a resolution reiterating the selection of O'Connor and Adams and immediately adjourned. In the election which followed O'Connor and Adams received 29,489 votes scattered through 23 states. This was not an impressive showing but the "Greeleyites" did little better and the 29,000 had the satisfaction of knowing that they had been true to a plank in their platform which read, "We welcome an eternal minority under the banner inscribed with our principles rather than an almighty and everlasting majority purchased by their abandonment."

MORE THAN A WHISPER

ARE indeed is the Presidential contest which does not bring out a "whispering campaign"—that attempt to discredit a candidate by circulating slanderous stories reflecting upon his morals or motives. So it is refreshing to learn that occasionally political partisans dare to speak out boldly against an opponent instead of working against him secretly and in the dark—to shout rather than to whisper.

One of the earliest examples of this kind of campaigning took place during the Adams-Jackson contest in 1828. It was a printed placard which read:

IMMORALITY
"Fellow citizens, can we vote for the man who openly sets the laws of the great Jehovah at defiance, thereby showing a bad example to our children? Some few Sundays ago Mr. Adams passed through Providence galloping and running his horse, and at every tavern stopping to receive the salutes or huzzahs of the Federal Party. I have always been an Adams man until he violated, and trampled on the laws of God; now my conscience forbids my supporting him. I therefore shall choose Andrew Jackson, one who keeps holy the Sabbath Day."

Early Doctor's Equipment

The average equipment of the pioneer physician in Ohio consisted of a few roots and herbs, several drugs, plenty of calomel, a few crude surgical instruments, a jar of leeches and a dignity which led people to believe that he was possessed of great learning.

Bridal bouquets go back to the three wheat-ears held in the right hand of Roman brides, as a symbol of plentitude.

For Bedspread and Scarf

Pattern 5560

"Company's coming!"—so out with the best bedspread, the dresser's matching scarf, both crocheted this easy way. You'll have reason indeed, to be proud of this lacy pair, to say nothing of a tea or dinner cloth, buffet or vanity set, all of which grow little by little as you crochet a simple medallion in humble string. Repeated and joined they make stunning "heirlooms." In pattern 5560 you will find complete instructions for making the square shown; an illustration of it and of all the stitches needed; material requirements.

All Around the House

If you use slip covers on your furniture, remove them occasionally and look for moths. Moths get into the tufts of furniture and multiply rapidly.

Potatoes to be French fried will be more crisp if allowed to stand in cold water for half an hour before frying.

Chamois gloves will be soft and pliable if a few drops of olive oil are added to the water in which they are washed.

Lemon juice and salt will remove scorch from white clothes. Hang clothes in sun until stain disappears.

When lighting a birthday cake always light the candles in the middle first and those on outside last.

Waterlilies grow best in a garden pool that is not too clean. They like sunshine and seldom bloom in shaded places.

Celery, lettuce or almost any vegetable may be refreshed by adding a little lemon juice to some cold water and letting the vegetables stand in it for a few hours.

A Barb at John Randolph

George Kremer, a Pennsylvania representative of the 1820s, once put over a good one in the house on aristocratic Southerner John Randolph of Roanoke.

The latter had just finished one of his flowery orations full of Latin and Greek quotations when Kremer arose and, to the amazement of all, launched into a fiery speech—in Pennsylvania Dutch. "Translate!" shouted Randolph. Answered him Kremer: "When you translate the dead languages you are using to us country members I will also likewise translate my living Pennsylvania Dutch for you to understand!"

Spirit of Kindness

KINDNESS is contagious. The spirit of kindness trickles down by a secret channel into the most recesses of the soul. One truly generous soul in a family will exert a sweetening and harmonizing influence upon all its members. It is wonderful how impossible it is to be in the face of a cheerful and generous helplessness. Beginning with the highest, the contagious drops even upon those who are unconscious of the cause, and the whole house is eventually filled with its fragrance.—Van Dyke.

SYNOPSIS

Lella Starr, young and beautiful and expert on paintings, is commissioned to do the portrait of the wealthy Kellers in the city where a party is in progress. She is to be a woman. Short-skirted and she goes down. She is to be a woman. Short-skirted and she goes down. She is to be a woman. Short-skirted and she goes down.

I could only stand and stare, gripped by a terrible uncertainty. I could not see that the figure in the window had been in. But it was in her room, I felt it was.

"Why didn't I see that?" I certainly saw the figure in that room, and saw the woman who had been in that room. I thought and then the hardness and the stiffness reformed. He told through his that seemed to be a woman's face. "I have a means of knowing who was in my room before I came up."

I didn't dare look at Alan Deck. I know I was asking myself if it had been in that room, then I thought of the gallery later, to bite my lip and hold my breath.

I could understand his eyes, then. I could understand his agony of eagerness to see her again, at once—his face he had tried to send by me; his eyes were staring.

It was all a mystery to me, but I had bitten my tongue out when I had burst out my angry words.

After she suddenly to my rescue. "It is getting us nowhere; all this doesn't matter. The question is where has Nora gone to? Has she changed her clothes, has she probably somewhere about, and I suggest we go out and help the men who are looking."

The men trooped off for coats and hats, and the October night, and the women were left together. I had a feeling that I was in disgrace, a dangerous interloper who might explode at any moment with more shattering bombs of revelation.

Suddenly Mrs. Crane said, in her practical voice: "A bandit couldn't possibly have got in here, could he, in the window and carried her off?"

"It sounds fantastic," said Mrs. Keller.

"Well, it's been done."

"I don't think that's possible. Look at the window," said her sister; "they came to the window. I had to help undo the bolts, and open the window. We all looked out in turn, the crisp air struck us sharply on our bare shoulders and we all turned the shiver of it; it seemed to speak of clarity and reality, and all this poster of domestic affairs and a vanished woman. One by one the three craned our heads over the sill, examining the scanty stone sill. "It doesn't look possible," Mrs. Crane admitted. "He might have used a ladder though—those things manage anything."

"That's too fantastic," said Mrs. Keller. "The window is in New York, enjoying the breeze. I shall never believe in anything like this."

"Don't believe in it, we could hear the noise of some of the men returning. They haven't found her," said Mrs. Crane, glancing in her head. "I expect I'll get a cold in my nose for this."

I took one more look out, down at that group of men, and so it was I who saw first what there was to see—down in the shadow of shade in the doorway directly beneath the window something hid behind—a faint, haggard blur.

I bent excitedly: "Mrs. Keller—draw back for her to look."

"Look there—in the shrubbery—under the window. There is something—"

It was invisible from where they were, for the shrubbery was thick and high, and the front part broken. Near the house the branches had bent in under the burden that they found there, the still slight body of a woman in gold pajamas; the lifeless form of Nora Harriden.

CHAPTER III

It couldn't be real. I felt. It was that scene in a dreadful play; that wasn't real people; this wasn't a real death. . . . It didn't seem possible that Nora Harriden could be dead; my impression of her so intense that I could not bring myself to believe in her death. Not till I had looked on her face.

I saw the thin, sharp curve of the pale lips, the little knife-blades and thought—in spite of my pity for the dead—that it was a hard, cruel, triumphant little mouth, made for execution.

They were kneeling all about her, feeling her pulse, her body. She lay in those incongruous gold pajamas, one slim silken foot bare of its shining slipper, on a sofa in the hall, until the doctor came.

No bones were broken, he reported; the bushes had eased her fall. But over her ear was a ghastly wound with the blood dried about it, and dark stains on her temple.

"Struck on something hard," he said sapiently. "Penetrated—death must have been almost immediate."

His voice, as he phrased that, slid into a consolatory cadence. He was looking up at the husband, who stood motionless beside him, his head slightly bent. I could not see his face; his hands were clenched at the sides. I felt suddenly a queer pity for those hands—I wondered if one of them had indeed struck out at that adored woman who had infuriated him so much. . . .

And then I thought again that it might have been Alan Deck. Surely the husband would rather have the onus of that blow upon himself than admit that another man was lounging in his wife's room—though perhaps these people thought little of casual intimacies.

A conference was going on. I heard Harriden's voice saying, in his grim, unshaken tones: "She probably wanted more air—tried to open the window wider, and was dizzy—she'd taken headache stuff—and fell."

"Oh, an accident, undoubtedly," said Keller in his convincing, everyday voice.

I heard the doctor assenting. I had a feeling that he would assent politely to anything these plutocratic clients dictated—with his own secret reservations.

"She was there on the bed when you came up, wasn't she, Dan?" Mrs. Keller asked.

The husband hesitated. "I couldn't be sure. The room was dark, and I assumed she was still on the bed sleeping, so didn't speak." He added, with positiveness now: "She was there when I went down. When I came in to see her after I had dressed—that was at eight, or a little after—she was at her head, and she wanted nothing sent up. I rang for the maid and told her not to come in to do anything in the room—that Mrs. Harriden wanted complete rest. I don't remember whether Mrs. Harriden said anything further to you or not, Anson. Did she?"

"Why no, sir," said Anson. "It was just you, sir, at the door."

"But you saw her there on the bed?"

"Why, yes, sir," said Anson, a little surprised. "I could see through the door. You sort of whispered to me. You said she was asleep."

"Did I?" said Harriden wearily. "I forget—I think she'd turned over and wanted to sleep. And I don't remember whether the window was open or not. I suppose it was a little way."

"Anson," said Mrs. Keller, "was the window open when you came up?"

"Why, yes, ma'am, it was," said Anson promptly. "I remember the room felt chilly, so I closed and locked it."

Whether Nora Harriden had gone out that window before her husband looked in, or just afterward, it had all happened while we were sitting down there about that dinner-table, eating and drinking and uttering our banalities.

There was more talk, I remember; and then Nora Harriden was carried upstairs. Her husband carried her, her bare arms drooping under his big shoulders, her blood-stained head like a child's asleep on him, and took her to the bed I had seen waiting.

Then Mrs. Keller, practical in all stress, said abruptly, "Look here, Dan—I want you to take charge of her responsibility. You are in there, I don't want her pearls on her. Take them in your room," she said, and stepped quickly inside.

The next instant she gave a queer, muffled cry and came stumbling out.

"Quick—somebody—come!" she said incoherently.

And then, in a thin voice of horror: "It's blood! I stepped in it!"

Mrs. Crane caught hold of her and we all stood about, staring down at the jade green slipper she lifted, at the wet, dark stain on the sole. The doctor hurried into the closet, and the doctor hurried into the closet. Harriden stood rigid by his wife's bed. Both men came backing out, and Keller was holding up a forefinger, dark-stained and sticky.

"It's blood all right," he said.

The doctor, looking down at his own finger, nodded affirmatively. Every one stood staring at them a moment then flattered forward to that open closet door and I went with them. The light was on in it. On the floor, just under a sweep of orchid silk, lay a dark heavy pool, its edges blurred where feet had stepped into it. It must have been there, dark, unregarded, when Harriden had stepped in, to glance about for his wife's gold pajamas.

Harriden marched to the closet door, and I shrank aside, trembling in my excitement and pity. He seemed to stare there quite a time, and when he came out his face was more than ever like granite.

"Yes, it's blood," he said, as if no else's word could be accepted. I glanced about for Alan Deck. He was not in the room; he had not followed when we had trooped like sheep after Harriden and his dead wife. Perhaps the sight of Nora in Harriden's arms. . . . I was grateful that he was spared the sight of Nora Harriden's blood on her closet floor.

"This puts a new complexion on it," said Keller. His words seemed incongruous, but his tone did full justice to the terrible gravity of the situation. He turned directly to Harriden. "That blood in the closet—that came before she went out the window. This doesn't look an accident, Dan. Some one got in here. Some thing—" His eyes turned to the window. "I suppose that way is possible," he said grudgingly, "though how any one could get in the grounds—I suppose he was after her jewelry. He got in, thinking the room empty, went to her closet to rummage, and she jumped off the bed after him—she had plenty of pluck."

He paused, and the assenting undertone of murmur about him confirmed Nora Harriden's pluck. "Then," said Keller, "he struck her and flung her out."

Keller's next question, so eminent that of the practical man, seemed to me shocking in its immediate concern for material things.

"Better see if anything's missing," he advised briskly. "See if he got away with anything."

Harriden did not stir.

"What the devil does it matter?" he growled. He looked half savage with pain, at bay against the world.

The doctor spoke up persuasively: "But you want to have the man apprehended, Mr. Harriden. The man who has done this—glancing toward the still figure on the bed he hesitated. Even in the presence of death the word murder had an incredible quality in that house.

"Every moment is of value," he urged. "Any jewel taken would be a clue. If—if you can bring yourself to it, Mr. Harriden—"

Harriden gave him a glance of cold contempt, as if for the imputation of weakness, and like a man suddenly waking moved forward: "I know where she put the box," he said, as "I know damned well what I wouldn't do," the young man retorted. He had lost his chattiness, banter, air; he looked extremely competent. He seemed quite pleasantly excited. "Anyway he shoved her in that closet before she was dead," he went on. "She must have been there some little time for all that blood to form. Then he thought again and decided to give it the look of an accident so he put her out the window. . . . A strong fellow."

I thought of how easily Harriden had carried his wife up the stairs and murmured, "She doesn't look heavy."

"About a hundred and fifteen," said Mitchell practically. He paused at the foot of the stairs and stood beside me, frowning intently as he tried to piece out the situation. He said, thinking aloud, "Dan did not see the blood when he went in to look for those gold pajamas—but then Dan was glancing along the level of his eye. . . . This fellow might have seen it when he came back—I'd say he did, and that was the reason he locked the door and took the key away. Presumably the key was in the lock, up to then. . . . And I'd say that he got out the window. He had the diamonds and didn't dare wait for more loot."

"And I'd say," I spoke up, somewhat spiritedly, "that every one of you is thinking about how it was done and what was taken and not about how awful it is."

Mitchell gave me a quick look. "You seem a simple-hearted young creature," he told me. "You never knew her—yet you rushed to her room to help her cover her slapped cheek."

He gave a short laugh. "You may be glad she wasn't there—she'd have skinned you. She wouldn't have dreamed you'd come in anything but malice."

"We don't make her sound very pleasant."

"I never liked her," he said bluntly. "Come and have a drink. We need it."

The others had set the example and we entered the white dining-room for the second time that evening. I saw it was already filled and that a group was about Deck, who was standing straight and tall beside the buffet.

I saw him put an empty glass down very slowly and carefully, and it came over me that it was only then that he had heard of the grim discovery in the closet. It was tragic enough, I thought, to know the woman you loved was dead, but to have to learn that she had been done to death, brutally, violently, to have to hear it and give no sign. . . .

The police had come, four or five local authorities, with a head official named Donahay whose eyes were as cynical as Harriden's own, and the house became a bustle of confusion. Fingerprint men and cameramen trooped upstairs to the rooms, searchlights flashed outside the windows in the shrubbery. Again I had that sense of grotesque unreality, as if this were a scene from some morbid play.

Keller made to anticipate him, to save him the sight of that dark pool, and he went into the closet.

Harriden's bulk filled the doorway when he moved forward, gingerly, stopped and fumbled. I remember Mrs. Crane's saying in a low tone to Keller, "Hadn't you better telephone the lodge—have them keep a sharp look-out?" and his telling her to do it. She was just moving away from the phone when Harriden came out of the closet, bearing a morocco-covered box. "It's locked, all right," he reported.

"Well, if it's locked there can't be anything missing—the thief wouldn't lock it up again," Mrs. Keller murmured.

"We might open it, anyway, to make sure," said Keller. "Do you know where the key is?"

"She kept it somewhere in her dressing case."

Harriden went to a small green dressing case whose opening lid showed fittings of green enamel set in gold, lovely, luxurious fittings that any woman's heart would envy, and began fumbling about in it. I don't know why I watched his strong, blunt fingers so closely. They seemed to fascinate me. I felt so deadly sorry for him, in the work they had to do. Once he paused and his face had a queer, arrested look; I remember thinking that some especially intimate possession of his wife's had touched some chord of deep and bitter remembrance. He swept his fingers back and forth over the silk for a moment as if he had forgotten what he was after, then suddenly his hand lowered and he drew out a small key.

"Well, the man would never lock the case and put the key back there again," Mrs. Keller murmured with a sort of petty triumph.

"He might—just to put people off," Mrs. Watkins declared with the same sort of obstinacy.

"He might have had a pass-key," said the princess thoughtfully.

Harriden unlocked the case; he opened the lid and made such slow business of examining it, staring down into each tray of bright, glistening things that I wondered if he were thinking that those lovely baubles would never go about her throat and wrists again. He must be thinking it.

Then his voice came, with that sharp, almost grumbling irritation in it. "The pearls are here—and the emeralds. . . . And a lot of other junk. But the diamond chain isn't here."

"The diamond chain—her yellow diamonds?" Mrs. Keller caught up quickly. "Why, she was wearing them!"

Harriden stood a moment as if remembering. His eyebrows kept twitching but that was the only sign of emotion in that rigid face.

"Yes, she was wearing the chain," he said. "She had it on."

Some one said, "Hasn't she it on

Then his voice came, with that sharp, almost grumbling irritation in it. "The pearls are here—and the emeralds. . . . And a lot of other junk. But the diamond chain isn't here."

"The diamond chain—her yellow diamonds?" Mrs. Keller caught up quickly. "Why, she was wearing them!"

Harriden stood a moment as if remembering. His eyebrows kept twitching but that was the only sign of emotion in that rigid face.

"Yes, she was wearing the chain," he said. "She had it on."

Some one said, "Hasn't she it on

"It's Blood!"

Keller made to anticipate him, to save him the sight of that dark pool, and he went into the closet.

Harriden's bulk filled the doorway when he moved forward, gingerly, stopped and fumbled. I remember Mrs. Crane's saying in a low tone to Keller, "Hadn't you better telephone the lodge—have them keep a sharp look-out?" and his telling her to do it. She was just moving away from the phone when Harriden came out of the closet, bearing a morocco-covered box. "It's locked, all right," he reported.

"Well, if it's locked there can't be anything missing—the thief wouldn't lock it up again," Mrs. Keller murmured.

"We might open it, anyway, to make sure," said Keller. "Do you know where the key is?"

"She kept it somewhere in her dressing case."

Harriden went to a small green dressing case whose opening lid showed fittings of green enamel set in gold, lovely, luxurious fittings that any woman's heart would envy, and began fumbling about in it. I don't know why I watched his strong, blunt fingers so closely. They seemed to fascinate me. I felt so deadly sorry for him, in the work they had to do. Once he paused and his face had a queer, arrested look; I remember thinking that some especially intimate possession of his wife's had touched some chord of deep and bitter remembrance. He swept his fingers back and forth over the silk for a moment as if he had forgotten what he was after, then suddenly his hand lowered and he drew out a small key.

"Well, the man would never lock the case and put the key back there again," Mrs. Keller murmured with a sort of petty triumph.

"He might—just to put people off," Mrs. Watkins declared with the same sort of obstinacy.

"He might have had a pass-key," said the princess thoughtfully.

Harriden unlocked the case; he opened the lid and made such slow business of examining it, staring down into each tray of bright, glistening things that I wondered if he were thinking that those lovely baubles would never go about her throat and wrists again. He must be thinking it.

Then his voice came, with that sharp, almost grumbling irritation in it. "The pearls are here—and the emeralds. . . . And a lot of other junk. But the diamond chain isn't here."

Pattern No. 1910-B

The clever cutting of this useful pinafore is shown in the small diagram beside the little girl. You will see at once that this frock requires no seaming and of course the feature which so greatly intrigues children is the butterfly which forms the pocket.

Notice how simple it is to put on, merely slipped over the head and tied at each side. Mothers find it a great help because it can be used as an apron over a frock, which must be kept clean, or worn instead of a frock.

Scorn and Contempt

A MAN, by indulging in the habit of scorn and contempt for others, is sure to descend to the level of what he despises so the opposite habits of admiration and enthusiastic reverence for excellence imparts to ourselves a portion of the qualities we admire. Here, as in everything else, humility is the surest path to exaltation.—Dr. Arnold.

Nothing has such power to broaden the mind as the ability to investigate systematically and truly all that comes under thy observation in life.—Marcus Aurelius.

SMILES

On the Tone Beat

Head Cook—Didn't I tell you to notice when the soup boiled over? Assistant—I did. It was half past ten.

In Keeping

"Did he furnish his whole house with second-hand stuff?" "Yes—he even married a widow."—Stray Stories Magazine.

Self-Defence

He—But, darling, we arranged to keep our engagement secret. She—Yes, dear, but I could not help it. Yesterday Elsie said no idiot would ever marry me, and I had to contradict her.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Strained Relations

Mrs. Smith—Your husband is sulking again, I see. What's wrong this time? Mrs. Jones—Oh, it's too silly. Just because I used his new tennis racket to strain the potatoes.—Pearson's Magazine.

Youth Inspired

By Visit to Prison

An Atlanta school teacher arranged to take her class, consisting of boys about twelve years old, to the federal penitentiary. Her idea was to let the visit act as a moral lesson about the wages of sin and the result of growing up to be bad boys.

The class trooped through the prison, were shown everything permissible by the courteous guide and finally came to the exit gate. One youngster, in piping voice, remarked to his nearest companion: "I tell you, Bill, when I go to prison this is the place I'm coming to."—Atlanta Constitution.

History of Karlsbad Recalled

A museum in Karlsbad has relics that bring back the 500 years' history of this famous spa. Karlsbad, according to legend, was founded by Karl IV, king of Bohemia, who wounded a baron with his arrow while hunting in the district. All trace of the baron was lost, but later it was discovered bathing his wounds at a well. The water of this well, being examined, was found to have healing qualities. Scenes of the early days of Karlsbad are shown in pictures, among them one of Wallenstein's entry during the Thirty Year's war. Ancient literature about the spa includes a "Tractatus de Theriacis Caroli Quarti" from 1521. The collection of local art includes the Karlsbad china goods, glassware and the work of local goldsmiths and there are many reminiscences of famous guests, such as Schiller, Goethe, Turgeneff, Bismarck.

FARM AND HOME NOTES

The notion that "if some is good, then more is better" is a dangerous one to follow in feeding iron, since too much iron may cause rickets, even when there is plenty of calcium, phosphorus, and vitamin D in the ration, workers at the state agricultural experiment station have found.

An analysis of business records from 224 dairy farmers revealed that farmers with herds producing more than 350 pounds of butterfat per cow received an average labor income of $454 while those with herds producing less than 250 pounds recorded a loss in labor income of $256.

"Barnum Was Right"

The one and only P. T. Barnum is alleged to have said many things that never found their way into our copy-books—things to which few of us would wish to subscribe. But he uttered a profound truth when he said: "If you don't advertise your business, the sheriff will."

Firms which intend to stay in business, that is, firms which deal directly with the public, must advertise. By the same token, it is a sign that they mean to stay in business when they do advertise. For they are offering, through advertisements, the values in their stores.

You, the customer, will decide whether or not they ARE values. If they are not, it is "just too bad" for the firm that claimed they were. Don't you see, therefore, that no merchant can afford to misrepresent himself or his goods in print? Advertising merely magnifies a misrepresentation—brings the fatal day nearer.

Naturally, then, you can trust the advertisements in this paper. You can believe that the stores signing these advertisements want your trade, and are willing to earn it with honest values and fair treatment. Read the advertisements. Patronize the advertisers. It is to your selfish interest to do so.

SILVER DOLLAR BRADY RENTS PENTHOUSE FOR PRIZE HORSE

Silver Dollar Brady, wealthy cowboy from Dallas, has the world's "penthouse corral" high above Chicago on the 17th floor of the Hotel Sherman. Brady and his horse are shown here "at home" looking out over the city's attractive skyline.

"More Silver Dollars in circulation will bring back better business conditions a whole lot faster." That's the idea of Silver Dollar Brady, who arrived in Chicago today, with the intention of getting more Silver Dollars in circulation. Brady, big, six-foot wealthy rancher from the West, walked into the Hotel Sherman today, his prize horse trailing behind. First, he registered with the horse at his heels . . . then he went into the coffee shop and both man and beast had a bite to eat.

He had wired for reservations for himself and horse, and was given a penthouse high above the street on the 17th floor, with a special corral, hay, oats and all the horse.

"The trouble with paper money is, you don't feel 'em in your pocket," Brady said. "Now, it's different with Silver Dollars. You get 'em. They seem to be a whole lot more. But they're heavy, you spend 'em quicker."

Brady said he was going to Chicago merchants to pay their players in Silver Dollars.

"Then you just watch the boom," he said.

Brady, who is an Ambassador Good Will for the Texas Cattle Exposition at Dallas, wants a belt made of old and new Silver Dollars.

A shortage of horses and mules in the United States, with resultant record top prices, has caused an unprecedented breeding race, according to the Horse and Mule Association of America. There are about 16 million horses and mules in the country now, or about 800,000 fewer than this time last year.
